The Walls of Troy L. A. Witt

Just when the pieces begin to add up, danger blows them all apart... MA1 Iskander Ayhan's orders are simple: stay with Admiral Dalton's son as a plainclothes bodyguard while the kid attends university classes. So typical-a high-ranking officer abusing Navy resources for unnecessary security. It isn't long before Iskander realizes there's more to his assignment than protecting the kid from benign harassment by homophobic classmates. Behind those piercings, eyeliner, and bad attitude, Troy Dalton is scared. Truly, deeply, scared. Troy is indeed hiding something. Iskander is the only one who's ever taken his fears seriously, which gives him hope. Yet Troy isn't sure one lone, armed-to-the-teeth bodyguard is enough to keep him safe, especially since he can't risk telling Iskander the truth. As Iskander slowly gains Troy's trust, the walls start coming down. And before they know it, the warmth between them explodes into real heat. Until suddenly Iskander realizes he's a magnet for danger, not a shield. Now he doesn't know how to keep Troy safe-stay close, or get as far away from him as possible. Warning: Contains a younger man with a thing for older men, and an older man who doesn't usually have quite so much trouble resisting younger men. Author is not responsible for any bad academic habits that might result from watching these two "study" for their exams.
